A programming language is a set of constructs, symbols and techniques for building computer programs. The language, the tools, and the method are collectively called a computer programming language. Strictly speaking, most of the programming languages are domain-specific, where one domain refers to a specific area of a software system, like web browsers or operating systems, rather than a specific set of programming techniques.Domain-specific languages (DSLs) are not restricted to specific programming techniques, and are often Turing-complete; that is, can be proven to be equivalent to programming languages in a mathematical sense.
